

Provider Payments: How They Work, Implications for Cost & Quality, and Creating a Consumer/Purchaser Policy Agenda

August 2006

Resources & Background Material

The Consumer-Purchaser Disclosure Project has endorsed the creation of a full “dashboard” of performance measures, but as importantly the use of those measures to inform consumer choice and provider payment. Because provider payments have enormous implications for quality and efficiency, the Disclosure project hosted a meeting on July 26, 2006 to help consumers and purchasers gain a better understanding of (1) how providers are paid (with a focus on both Medicare and the private sector); (2) the implications for cost and quality; (3) the current changes being proposed and options for the future; and (4) potential strategies to impact this important debate.

This document lists materials and resources developed to provide both background on payment issues as well as to highlight the multiple perspectives held by a variety of stakeholders.

Today, payment systems are fundamentally flawed. Providing more services, treatments, and tests pays more – regardless of the quality or efficacy. In contrast, providers who deliver high-quality, efficient care are not rewarded for their efforts. Both the public and private sectors have employed various strategies to improve quality of care – accreditation, conditions of participation, quality improvement – but all are grafted onto a perverse payment system that is dysfunctional at best and all too often toxic.

The June 26th meeting included presentations by Peter Lee, Disclosure Project Co-chair and CEO of the Pacific Business Group on Health; Michael Ile, Vice President for Physician Network Management at UnitedHealthcare; and Paul Ginsburg, President of the Center for Studying Health System Change.
